Greetings fellow sex offenders,

Or as I like to refer to us as, SO People – pronounced so, like the word. I just think that's a more polite reference to us don't you think? We could also be referred to as SOWERS. Even has a great acronym. Sex Offenders Want Equal RightS. If you're like me you're pretty mad about the way you have been treated by the judicial system. First we get sentenced by a judge. That's our official punishment. We all get that. But for us SO People, once we get to prison the inmates themselves add more punishments to us. They harass us, intimidate us, threaten us, and even attack us. They don't do that to burglars, to robbers, to dope dealers (even those who sell to kids), or even to murderers. I knew some first-degree murderers when I was in who purposely murdered their victims and they got along just fine with fellow inmates, but us SOWERS – with victims alive and well – we're at the bottom of the barrel in the pecking order of things. And we get no help from prison staff either. We're housed in general population with all of the other inmates. We're not in a protective custody location in any way. We're left to fend for ourselves in any way we can. I had to pay one of my attackers protection money periodically so he wouldn't do it again – I bought things for him at the prison store, the canteen. Soon after we get to prison our counselor gives us a paper called a Legal Status that lists our charge, back time credits, release date, or even a parole board hearing date if we don't have a release date yet. Some dirty shot-caller inmate will undoubtedly insist we show that to him to "prove" we're not one of those "baby rapers" as we are called. Counselors could easily issue us an altered copy with a non-sex charge on it so we could show that to the nosy shot caller, but no – we're a stuck pig. They don't care about our safety. And today it's even worse with us listed on the internet for all to see with just a few mouse clicks. The Megan's Law web site claims its purpose is so the public can better protect themselves and their families. But they don't take us down from the site if we go back into custody – instead, they list us as incarcerated. So even if we had altered papers we're still a stuck pig. All inmates have to do is call a family member or friend on the outside and ask them to check the internet on a certain inmate. Getting us off the internet would help protect us while we're in. They could at least do that! And then once we get out of prison we're stuck going to therapy so some psychiatrist can keep reminding us to not do it again, as if we haven't learned there is a severe penalty for it. Worse yet, some of us get stuck having to pay our hard-earned money for that therapy – grrr!!! We're totally up to fending for ourselves and it's high time we return some of our anger back upon society in some ways! I just can't stand double standards. That's a Prime Directive violation I've always avenged! As all of us should avenge. A two-tiered system of justice should not be stood for in any way, period! Here's a thought. Those agreeing with the suggestions I speak favorably about below should join in as a group and pass these thoughts on to other SO People. We can call our group the Sex Offenders Network, or SON for short – pronounced son, like the word. As a group we're SONERS. That works for me. : -) And our Mission/Prime Directive is to cost, inconvenience, and aggravate the judicial system and society at large until all forms of double standards are eliminated – CIA I call it. The Declaration of Independence states that "all men are created equal." In my book that means no double standards. We expect it and we're not settling for anything less. Black and gay people had their fights to eliminate their double-standard issues, which they still work at. Now it's our turn. We're the last group that it seems acceptable for others to treat us in this way. We need to change that thought pattern NOW!

From personal experience I can tell you it feels good to make other people angry when I am angry. It does wonders to help lower ones own anger level. While there are ways to do it legally, there are also illegal ways that are considerably more satisfying. I do need to add a disclaimer though.

The incidents depicted here are for entertainment, amusement, and protective purposes only. They are in no way intended to be other than educational and/or instructional. They are not portrayed with the intent of helping to promote methods, actions, or devices which assist others in breaking the law. This is not a handbook to be used as a guide meant to be put into practical use. It does not encourage breaking laws. Each individual has the responsibility to make up his or her own mind as to whether or not to do so, or even how far they wish to go to even the score, if they in their own mind of their free will even choose to do so at all. Likewise, this material officially is not advising, recommending, inducing, counseling, commanding, cajoling, organizing, procuring, soliciting, aiding, abetting, instigating, inciting, enticing, assisting, promoting, teaching, endorsing, advocating, or whatever word you want to use anyone to break any laws, produce imminent lawless action, or willfully cause the commission of any offense or crime. It is not treasonous and is against the overthrow of the government and anyone who endeavors to persuade anyone to engage in such conduct. It merely is actively against the abusive actions of certain members employed by, or working on behalf of, that government. Nothing here is intended to obstruct justice in any way. On the contrary, our goal is merely to bring real justice for all concerned. Nor is any conspiracy taking place as defined by conspiracy laws as no one is together agreeing to cooperate or engage in criminal activity together. I'm merely reporting as an author. Not encouraging, but merely "suggest" what "should" be done, and sometimes, "actively suggest" what others "should" do. "Speak favorably" is a term I like to use. The author disclaims any responsibility for all liability and/or damages. Although this letter is about revenge, the author expressly disclaims responsibility for any adverse effects arising from the use of techniques described within. The author assumes no responsibility for the use or misuse of information contained in this letter or for any infringements of rights of third parties that may arise from the use of any information in this letter or from the ideas portrayed in its stories. I assume no responsibility for the reader's performance or actions or behavior towards any of the actions and/or deeds mentioned herein and shall not be held liable for any direct or indirect damages resulting from their use. Under no circumstances, including negligence, will the author assume any liabilities, or be liable to anyone, for any incidental, special, or consequential damages of any kind that may result from the information contained herein, its use, or non-use, even if the writer has been advised of the possibility of such damages. It is given to you for entertainment purposes only.

The publication of dirty tricks such as these should not be construed as prima facie evidence that the author supports or condemns the ideas therein, in whole or part, nor that those ideas represent the personal views of the author in all cases. Freedom of the press in this country was founded upon the concept of the citizenry making informed decisions through an open marketplace of ideas. May the best ideas win. I make no bones about it though, I do speak favorably of some of these things. They are things I would like to see happen to even scores. We're all responsible for our own behavior. If you choose to do something illegal to satisfy your anger that's your choice. The 1st Amendment of our United States Constitution does allow us to express our opinions and beliefs as to what others should do to get satisfaction even if others find them distasteful. I can legally say people should do X. I can't legally encourage them to go do it though, and I don't. Therefore, everything in this letter that tends to sound like encouragement, or enticement, or instigating, or any of the many other legalese words one wants to use should be considered as my opinions as to what should happen. Does that make my words perfectly legal to say then? If not, then consider them unsaid or switch them around to legalize them. Now let me continue with lawful words here. Just be careful.

Some people may have greater anger than others over certain things and their revenge may be more intense. It's all just a part of the natural variation in nature. These are personal choices we all have to make. It is best to limit actions to costing or inconveniencing others by your anger-producing method rather than physically hurting someone but that decision is obviously up to you. You are the one who best knows your anger level. We have to have the stance that we're the wrong people to violate and we're not going to stand for it any longer. I've always looked at it as if someone violates me – whether it's an individual person, a group of people, or an organization – they're giving me permission to avenge them in any way I see fit, and they waive all sniveling rights when I do so. And this is especially so when the violator is advised of the wrong behavior but refuses to correct it. They basically left it up to me to get justice. We have the power of revenge and we need to exercise it! It's amazing how they'll do dirty things to us and then have the nerve to actually expect us to accept it. Well it's high time we let them know we won't accept it!!! Dirty actions have consequences. Display that attitude. Put on the Armor of Revenge. Abuse proof yourself.

Think back to the day you were arrested. Now think ahead to your last day on probation or parole. Between these times you have dealings with people of the judicial system. At first it was with police, sheriff, or some kind of law enforcement agent, then a prosecutor and judge, next came jailers or correctional officers, and eventually a probation or parole officer. These people occasionally do things that make you angry. Sometimes, they make you do something you don't want to do. Other times, they deny you to do something you would like to do. Then there are also those times they just commit some dirty wrongful deed. And a good number of these angering times there's no legitimate reason for their actions. No one is benefited by them. They don't even pass the smell test. They just expect you to absorb that anger into your body and live with it. Well you shouldn't! You should return it to them, or at least to somebody. As I said earlier, it feels good to make other people angry when you're angry. It lowers your anger level. Imagine for a moment where your anger level would be if they didn't do any anger-provoking things to you throughout your stay within the judicial system. Wishful thinking, and not likely to happen, but if they didn't your anger level would obviously be quite low on your last day of probation or parole supervision. Your goal should be to have that same level of anger on that last day as you would have had if the angering things would have never happened in the first place. And you do that by not absorbing their anger into your body and living with it, but, as I said, by returning it in some ways. Accomplish that and you've won the battle. It's that simple! All options at achieving it should be on the table – whatever it takes! Never apologize for lowering your anger level to where it naturally should be. Do not be an absorber. I call this anger management technique, Operation Return.

If you've been knocked around once too many times a revenger lives within you. He sits and stews most days, biding his time, when he occasionally gets to stretch his limbs into yours and laugh the wild, crazy laugh of adrenaline as he finally gets to settle a score. You know him, although perhaps you're wary of his power and like to consider yourself too mature and responsible for his regular company. But he cannot be ignored. He must be walked, and he must be fed. Otherwise, he'll make you a wreck. The following paragraphs are his. Non-violent ways to cost, inconvenience, and aggravate others who have earned your heartfelt contempt. They're vicarious opportunities for you to get to know him better. They're a nudge, a not-too-subtle elbow in the ribs, to surrender to his adventurous wryings and live life at another level. Your revenger within is restless. Unleash him. Outdoors. NOW!

So now let's get started in lowering our anger. Many cities have an ordinance on the books that it is illegal to put advertisements on telephone or streetlight poles but few enforce it. I always carry a single-edge razor blade in my wallet and routinely take advertisements down when I pass by on my bicycle going somewhere. Besides cleaning up the neighborhood, my real reason is to anger the sign owner who now can't sell, rent, or promote whatever was being advertised. For a person who only has minimal anger maybe this legal method of revenge may satisfy his or her needs. People discard furniture, appliances, and even clothing out to the street and some of it is not junk, but instead only gently used. Technically nobody owns it then so when I destroy it as much as possible so nobody can enjoy it I am not breaking the law. People see it destroyed and are pissed and that makes me happy. They don't get a freebee. I love cutting the straps off of car seats people have discarded when their toddlers have outgrown them. I especially love destroying discarded toys that are in decent shape so some kid can't enjoy them. Doesn't happen that often but it really makes my day. : -) After all, these extra restrictions and grief are on us because of kids. It feels especially good to cause them grief. And if anyone bellyaches about you destroying things just give them the name of your probation or parole officer as the person who put the extra grief on you so you're just returning it back upon society. No reason to hide what you're doing when you're not even breaking the law. You could even open toy boxes in stores, break it, seal it back up, and when the kid gets it broken he or she is sad. That's cool! I occasionally find used but decent shoes someone put out by the sidewalk. I take them and leave one at a prominent location likely to be found and the other one more than a mile away. Two different people will find a shoe and be pissed they can't find the other one. I've pissed off two people with one pair of shoes. And on each shoe I'll cut the shoelaces in a couple of places leaving them the unwritten message, "I don't need the shoelace but I don't want you to enjoy it either." Yea! And if there's several pairs of shoes left out I dump all lefts at one location and all rights at another some distance away. On occasion someone waiting for a bus leaves a soda behind filled with drink and ice because it can't be taken on the bus. I will tip it over while saying to myself, "I don't want somebody to enjoy it." And I say the same thing when I see a partially-smoked cigarette butt on the ground. I scrape my shoe on it to break it up and destroy it. Even little opportunities to anger others are wins for our side.

I personally love vandalism though. No one is physically hurt – only angered and/or cost money, Yea!!! There are many thousands of cars parked on city streets all over town, in towns everywhere, and nobody is around them. Everything from rather new cars to old clunkers and everything in-between. The newer the car the angrier the owner would be if you took a sharp nail or pointed wood screw and put a small scratch on it all the way through to the bare metal near the door handle where it will be seen every time the owner gets in. It's easy to do. Just make up some fliers stashed in an over-the-shoulder bag and put them on windshields with one hand as you sneakily scratch a couple inches or so with the other hand. Doing 10 at a time every 10 days works great. People are always putting fliers on windshields so that activity draws no suspicion, but if someone approaches you just drop the nail or screw and deny everything. I would suggest counting not so nice cars as half. I'd need to scratch two of them for each day I want to do a vengeance thing because their owners aren't as mad about getting a scratch as a new-car owner is. Just a thought – Hmmm!

Puncturing the sidewall of tires with an awl (a sharp pointed tool available at Home Depot, Lowe's or any other hardware store) will require the owner to buy a new tire as internal patches or plugs can't fix sidewall punctures. Using an awl rather than a sharp knife is best because a knife would make a big gash causing air to leak out fast and loud, whereby an awl will just poke a small hole causing air to escape slowly with hardly any noise so it wouldn't attract attention. Ah, nice touch. I like that one. : -) Whatever you're angry about, whether it's being forced to wear a GPS or missing some special event because they won't let you travel out of your local county, you can do a vandalism incident or even several for each day of the angering event. At the end of the day if your vandalism incident has erased your anger just as if the angering event would have never happened you've won. Yea!!! That was your goal. It doesn't get any better than that. There are some annual events that are so important to me that I'd need to poke 40 tires per day of missed event to satisfy my anger. But then that's me. : -) Smarter people would never return to the same neighborhood on later days to poke tires. Plus being smarter they would be on a bicycle with a small bag of cans and bottles. Passing by a car parked on the street they bend down pretending to pick up a can or bottle and when they do they poke the tire, it's that easy. With the awl in one hand and a can or bottle in the other you could shake out the can or bottle giving the illusion you are emptying what you just picked up and therefore making yourself appear innocent to someone seeing you. Just like with putting fliers on cars during scratching incidents, this pretending to empty cans or bottles can easily cover ones tracks and there is no defense against it. Isn't that so cool? A GPS causes daily discomfort around the ankle so giving discomfort to others every day by making them change a flat tire is very rewarding, and especially so knowing they need to buy a new tire and not just patch or plug it. And for those of you having to pay your hard-earned money for the GPS poking 2 or more tires a day is quite appropriate. I just love revenge – it is so satisfying and so anger relieving. : -) Angering others really does lower anger – trust me, it really works. Larger-than-average tires are a special joy to get too due to their greater expense, although the rubber is thicker so they are harder to puncture. If your PO questions you just say you're out riding your bicycle getting exercise. He knows where you are at every moment because of GPS but not what you're doing. Another reason to poke more than 1 tire per day is this scenario. Some people's sex offense was committed decades ago with the person successfully completing supervision and not committing any new sex offences throughout the years. Now a new conviction for a non-sex offence gets them stuck on a GPS merely because of that ancient sex offense. Traffic fines are doubled in construction zones in some locations. This extra punishment on a decades-old sex offense should warrant greater revenge; hence more than 1 flattened tire per day of GPS wearing. Just my opinion here though. : -) And on top of that, probation and parole officers add more restrictions now than they used to decades ago. Back then I was restricted from being in the accompany of a minor unless a responsible adult was present. One adult was all it took to be in compliance. Now today they would restrict me from any place kids congregate, meaning all parks, even if hundreds of adults are present. These dirty double standard things are worse than ever and we really need to fight back. All options at doing so should be on the table! And we should have no guilt feelings accomplishing it either. There's a score sheet called Static-99 they now use to rate our risk level – no in-person interview, merely scoring us on its score sheet. And in some cases we're not scored correctly. They'll even disregard decades-old favorable reports done by psychiatrists that included in-person interviews along with various psychological tests. They stick us incorrectly in a higher-risk category and expect us to just accept it. Worse yet, it's posted as such on the internet thereby endangering our safety even more so. If they refuse to correct it after being advised of their error then extra tires per day is very warranted. One could even post labels all over town saying, "Attention men who like underage boys (or girls), a cute one lives at [home address]" – with the address of the child listed. They endanger us, we endanger them – that works for me. They need to have their feathers ruffled and failure is not an option!

Go to a clothing store and pretend you are looking through the racks of clothes at sizes, styles, and colors. In reality you're taking a sharp razor blade and slitting through pieces of clothing one after another on the racks. Just keep a count, you may need to go to several stores, and you'll surely go through a handful of razor blades. No worry though. You can get them in the paint department of hardware stores.

Now if your anger is a lot more maybe you need to scratch 365 cars or poke 365 tires. Only you know your anger level. Whatever it takes to erase the anger just as if the angering event would have never happened. One wonders how much vengeance is unleashed because of GPS that never happened in the past because we were able to get away with some minor things that nobody ended up being hurt by anyway like traveling beyond our permitted area as I did on several occasions. When I was on parole years ago before GPS was available I would go to annual events out of town for a few days and no one ever knew. No revenge happened because I got away with it and was never punished. Basically society won too with no vengeance unleashed so all was well in the world. But today with GPS requirements I couldn't do that. So here's what I would do. Seeing that I'd have to wait a whole year before I could go to that event again I would want to do 365 incidents of vandalism, 366 if it's a leap year. California Penal Code § 1210.7 (b) says that the "primary objective" of GPS is "the enhancement of public safety through the reduction in the number of people being victimized by crimes committed by persons on probation." Us avenging GPS accomplishes just the opposite of their primary objective and that brings a chuckle to my belly. How many of you would love to go swimming on a hot summer day but can't because your GPS device can't get immersed in water? Well then just be sure to replace that lost recreation with recreational vandalism. Miss one happiness, but add another kind. That works for me – and beautifully at that. : -) I refer to myself as an avid vandal. Avid means enthusiastic, passionate, and eager. That's me about vandalism . : -)

Get a bottle of contact cement from the hardware store (Original Gorilla Glue from the paint department of Home Depot is ideal) and popsicle sticks from the craft/hobby department of Walmart, where they are called Wooden Craft Sticks – preferably 3/4" wide Jumbo Wooden Craft Sticks. Dip a stick into the bottle and then shove it into the coin slot of a pay phone or parking meter and break it off. After dry lots of luck getting it out. With parking meters it directly aggravates and costs the judicial system and that is a major plus. Some parking meters additionally take credit cards as payment so that access point can be glued up too.

Dip a toothpick into the bottle of contact cement and shove it into the key lock of a closed business then break it off making sure no piece is left sticking out that could be pulled out with pliers. If too thick, squeeze it flat with pliers first. Once dry the owner won't be able to open his business until he drills the glued lock out of the door. Lost business and an expense for just a second or so of your time causes a lot of grief. That feels pretty good. Do the same with locks on parked cars. Also the padlocks on locked gates around schools and playgrounds. I refer to the activity as toothpicking.

Being made to miss Halloween is another hot-button issue of mine. I never suffered that one but I know others currently on probation and parole do. They call it Operation Boo. They're told to not only not give out candy to kids, but to stay home and not even go out to adult Halloween events. I love Halloween festivities and would severely avenge being forced to miss any. Parents are always with their kids out trick or treating. No one's going to pull one into the house and molest them. Be reasonable folks – you don't need to cheat us out of our Halloween festivities. Work at lowering our anger levels and not raising it. With that society benefits. Can't you see that? There's no need to leave vandalized victims floundering on the side of the road as collateral damage needing to be cleaned up later. Some less-strict jurisdictions leave us a loophole though. We're told to not open our door to trick or treaters, not have our porch light on, and not give out candy. You could open your door ahead of time, sit in your opened doorway, put a lamp from your house on a table outside your door (it's not a porch light), and give out fruit bars or a piece of fruit. None of those things was restricted and you still enjoyed the festivities loophole wise. Take that razor blade mentioned earlier and cut Halloween costumes in stores to not only cost and anger the store owner, but to make them less available for kids to buy. Making them sad they can't find the costume they'd like to have makes me happier. : -) Anything to aggravate kids makes my day. Maybe even slice Halloween candy packages in stores open. They can't be sold that way. This is another situation where 365 or 366 (leap year) incidents of grief to others is warranted. You have to wait a whole year before you can enjoy Halloween festivities once again so give society a years worth of grief. I call it Operation Boo Hoo.

There are a number of free pornography web sites out there (www.pornhub.com is one of them) with explicit adult sex videos, some being quite kinky. One could take a felt marker and write FREE PORN VIDEOS and then directly under that the web site's address on metal streetlight poles around junior and senior high schools and along streets leading to and from those schools. Kids being curious will likely check them out and if the parents find out by checking their kid's computer they will surely have a shit fit. Pissing people off and ruffling feathers – sure feels good. This one especially brings a chuckle to my belly. We're denied being able to do certain pleasurable things if kids are anywhere around – likely to congregate as they say – supposedly because they are worried we would introduce/entice kids into sexual activity. So here the advertisements are doing just that and all we're guilty of is an infraction that isn't even enforced. Isn't that so cool – accomplishing the opposite of what they're trying to accomplish? One could also set up an account on a social media site that kids frequent and advertise the porn site. Just be sure to use a phony name. You could even get a custom t-shirt printed with the advertisement on it and it will be seen wherever you go. Go to www.google.com and enter these two words in the search field, custom t-shirts. There you'll get links to a number of places that will do the job for you. Some parents bellyache or even protest at school board meetings when gay/LGBTQ+ pride activities are spoken favorably about during gay/LGBTQ+ pride month every June and they're also especially angry about library books written for kids that speak favorably about families that have same-sex partners in them. These schools need to be flooded with porn ads on streetlight poles just to anger those discriminatory/overly conservative parents. You could even write the link on random pages of books of interest to older kids found in libraries and book stores. Go to google and search these three words, free porn sites. You'll get links to a number of porn sites worthy of getting advertised. You could write different porn sites on different streetlight poles giving the kids quite a variety. Cool 'eh? I refer to the activity as porning.

And when you go to the grocery store cut the straps off of the baby seat in the shopping cart so the parents can't strap the baby in. They then have to get another cart and deal with the inconvenience. Just another thing to piss parents off. Chuckle, chuckle. : -) And the same for the straps on baby changing stations in public restrooms.

In California here our Megan's Law web site is at, www.meganslaw.ca.gov and each state has their own web site. Here is where you can go to look up the registries in other states, www.nsopw.gov/all-registries. You see, we can use these databases to our advantage too – and it's high time we do. We need to communicate together so we can fight these newer abusive restrictions they're sticking us with. We are at war – and I'm not talking Middle East style. I'm talking about our neighborhoods, and we're the targets. Well it's time we fight back BIG time! Going back some years ago there was no Megan's Law, Jessica's Law, housing restrictions, restrictions from us just going to a park, school, library, pool, or beach, community notifications, GPS, or internet databases listing us for all to see. Sure, those SO People had to register with police, per Penal Code § 290, but that was it. They lived wherever they wanted after release and there were no databases for the public to check. I was released pre Jessica's Law so it's housing restrictions don't affect me, but I was still turned down housing after several apartment managers checked the Megan's Law web site before they would rent to me and I got stuck living in a place I didn't like as well. Clearly I'm mad. And I'm even madder seeing what you more newer-released guys, with greater restrictions and aggravations, have to go through and that none of you seem to be avenging it. Shame on you! There's no reason we should just sit back and accept any double standards. And just so you know, I'm not speaking favorably towards avenging standard conditions of probation or parole all offenders face, or even fair and reasonable punishments, only those double standard ones directed at us SO People – double-standard violations being the key gripe.

John Garner, who killed teenagers Amber Dubois and Chelsea King in 2009 & 2010, said in an interview how angry he was over being forced to move from a place that was too close to a school, even though parole officials previously approved of it, and then having to sleep in his car. Additionally, he was mad that he had to quit a good paying job that a previous parole officer approved of but a new one wouldn't, apparently because it was beyond his permitted travel area. Although he didn't say it directly, I tend to believe those two girls would be alive today if John only had the PC 290 requirements and parole conditions of past years. And if that is true, then every person who voted for Jessica's Law should be considered partially responsible for their deaths. Well my belief is we need vengeance. These people have to learn we're the wrong people to violate.

Every time I see neighbors picketing and pressuring someone to move out, especially when they are legally entitled to live there, my blood just boils. Add to that some newer released guys are being made to live in places and conditions they don't like because of the more recently enacted Jessica's Law, although I do understand they have lightened up on some of its restrictions. And then on top of that, some communities have enacted their own local ordinances where every PC 290 registrant, even us from years or decades ago convictions, can't live there or even go to parks, school, libraries, pools, or beaches – or anywhere else that kids are likely to congregate. While some places allow us to visit those areas if we have written permission from someone in charge of the location, others ban us altogether. These things I totally ignore. I refuse to suffer anything that wasn't a part of my original sentencing conditions. I only go to these places to enjoy the activities that are available and not to break laws. So while I'm breaking the letter of the law by being there, I'm obeying the spirit of it by not breaking any legitimate laws. But I'll be the first to admit, if they somehow found out I'm there without permission and want to punish me for it then they're in for a ton of revenge and there'll be no guilt feelings at my end of the stick when I enact it. I'd have no complaint with a punishment if I really did break a legitimate law. But I'm sure not going to accept a punishment over some chicken-shit thing, and especially when my original offense happened decades earlier. I sure hope you other SO People out there adopt this same stance. Reasonable restrictions or punishments are one thing, but not the dirty kinds some commit against us. Those we definitely won't stand for. It seems that once we've been arrested we're forever a target for these people to violate us. We're the wrong people to violate, period! I cannot emphasize that enough! Make sure you have that stance too. No double standards and backed up with zero tolerance.

Dirty people out there want to see us suffer and live in uncomfortable conditions and even be so brazen as to brag about it. Somehow they can't understand how angry people want to return anger upon others, – although some of you SO People don't seem to be doing it; grumble, grumble! : - (They can't understand that people living in a stable environment and where they want to live, possibly with family, makes them less prone to lash out at society. In some cases recent parolees have a place to live with family but can't because of its close proximity to a school or park so will instead sleep in their car at night parked out of the restricted zone then come home to clean up and eat etc. during the day. Now what difference does it make where the guy sleeps? Are children more safe with a disgruntled guy sleeping in the uncomfortable conditions of a car, or even in a sleeping bag on the ground as also happens? Some are "lucky" enough to get a motel paid for by the state, but even that's an unacceptable aggravation. Can't you see how he would want to be spiteful to the society that is making him live that way? Heck, I'm spiteful and I have a comfortable bed to sleep in and suffer no harassment by neighbors. (Although I live in a trashy neighborhood where neighbors don't seem to care so that's not saying a lot.) I'm just so pissed how everyone finds it so acceptable to discriminate and wish suffering upon others who have paid their debts that the law required. And that debt ends on the last day of probation or parole. No more punishment should be accepted. As I briefly mentioned earlier, we're the last group of people that discrimination seems to be okay with. Therefore I consider everyone an enemy because I know how they would treat me if they knew my past. And honestly I can't understand why you wouldn't want revenge. Those of us who did a jail or prison sentence had to deal with hostile inmates (who hate our offense while at the same time accept those inmates who commit a violent offense that doesn't involve sex), and sometimes unfair correctional officers who knew what we did, and now the double whammy – hostile neighbors on the outside. I don't know what makes me madder – that others do this to you or that you let them get by with it.

Any expenses incurred like being forced to move should be avenged back to society too. Ditto if you're at a lower-paying and/or less enjoyable job due to others not hiring you after seeing your offending history on the internet. And if you've worked at a place for years doing an excellent job and then get fired after they find you on the registry then it goes without saying that finding a fitting punishment for that place should be considered a given. Some states charge a fee for SO People to register the first time and every time they periodically update it with police. That expense of course should be avenged back to society. It sure feels good making others angry when I'm angry. And it's extra enjoyable doing it within the boundaries of a community that, through their own local ordinances, puts extra restrictions on those of us from years-ago convictions. If we can't have the greater joy others enjoy then let us find joy in making others less happy, right under our PO's nose. That works for me. : -)

To aid in your happiness near the end of your life make sure if you do have any assets that your money goes where you want it to go. If you have no family make sure it doesn't go to organizations that help people. Give it to places that help animals or something. Animals don't hate us because we once offended. And make sure no one gets your organs either. I'm not into helping people while alive or dead. Ditto for never donating blood either.

Go to Google and type in "examples of revenge" or some such phrasing of that nature in the search field. I'm sure you can come up with a number of sites that will give you imaginative ideas at vengeance and that can fall within your personal conscious level.

I suggest we dig into the personal affairs of anyone that is making our lives more aggravating and post their addresses and children's information to other SO People so they can see how it feels to have angry people know where they live. Include in this bunch lawmakers, probation and parole officers, law enforcement officers, prosecutors, judges, people who run web sites that speak out against us (and there are many), and anyone else openly against us.

I only have so much money for stamps. Please photocopy this letter and send it to other random SO People you can find on the Megan's Law web site. My goal is to get these "favorable speaking" words to every registered SO Person in the United States as most other states practice similar abusive tactics upon us – and some are considerably worse, clearly deserving even more severe retribution. To find SO People in other states go to that other web site I mentioned earlier. Each state has their own individual registry web site. You can also go to Google and type in sex offender registry XX, with XX being the state you're looking for. If each one of you sends this letter to five others in adjoining ZIP codes and those five send it to five more and on and on we can really get the word out all over the country with just a little bit of money out of each of our pockets. With the randomness involved some of you will surely receive several copies from different individuals but that's okay. Think of the personal satisfaction an angry SO Person can get spreading these words to others while not even risking breaking the law. Note that I've kept no list of who I've sent this letter to so authorities will never know you're a receiver of it.

Some years ago I created a website/book named Revenge on the Judicial System – Don't Get Mad, Get Even which contains a good deal more ingenious methods some have used, or merely thought about using, to settle scores at the judicial system. Just go to this link and you'll have it. http://tlarsen.us/revenge.html. That's it. Sit back and enjoy the book. : -) It's free by the way. Please feel free to post any of my writings to social media sites you use or even upload my files there too. I want to get the word out as much as possible. We're in this war together, and we're fighting it together.

Remember, use gloves, don't touch the letters or envelopes. And don't lick the stamps or envelopes which would leave your DNA behind. The California Megan's Law web site [Section 290.46 (i)] states that it is illegal for PC 290 registrants to "enter" the site. According to that, you can look around all you want inside just as long as a non-SO Person clicks the "Continue" button to enter it. Alternately, if you're worried use that other web site for other states and find one that doesn't have that restriction – most don't. Libraries let you use computers for free. If you have a laptop computer you could go to a place that has free Wi-Fi so the internet service provider you have at home will have no record of you visiting the Megan's Law web site. Just clear your web browser's history when done so if authorities do a compliance check they won't find any suspicious web browsing. Don't keep questionable files on your home or work computers. It's not as big of a win if you end up getting punished for this stuff. Think it out. With care we, as a group, can cause a lot of grief and pain upon the society that is causing us grief and pain and have no risk of it coming back to bite us. And with that care there's no defense against this. In a totally anonymous way those databases give us an ability we never had before to communicate & cooperate together. I love putting a plan together and making it work and turning their own technology back against them. Using a fictitious name sign up for an off-site internet based location to store questionable files. I suggest two sites so one is a backup of the other. Some sites that give free E-mail access include such file storage capability. (www.hotmail.com does so. Once you establish an account click on the 9 dots near the top left of the page then OneDrive. That's your drive to store files in.) You could also set up two regular E-mail accounts and send the file to yourself at the other one as an attachment. You can download the questionable file at the library to do work on it then upload it back for safekeeping. I also suggest password protecting these stored files. Check out www.winzip.com to accomplish that. If it's a pay site don't use a credit card that has your name on it. Instead, get a prepaid credit/debit card from a check cashing place that is not tied to your real name. Of course, it goes without saying, don't leave a paper trail anywhere in your house that you established these sites. You always want to be able to withstand a search by law enforcement and have the confidence that you are squeaky clean. And one more thing, don't send an illegal E-mail from home or work from an account that you set up with a fictitious name thinking it won't come back to bite you. The IP address of your internet service provider is hidden within that E-mail and it'll lead right back to your front door.

Returning grief onto others helps soften the grief they inflict upon us. They care less whether we're uncomfortable or even injured by inmates while in prison. Some people I've heard on talk radio have openly expressed joy when hearing that one of us got injured by other inmates, yet they would never express such joy if it happened to a person because of their race. They have no business at all being surprised by our lack of care for society. I personally don't want to have sex with a child, but I'd sure love to cause grief to one – and then listen to all the parents snivel about why it happened. I'm sick and tired of being screwed over because of these damn kids. As long as we keep our hands off of them sexually their parents just better learn to live with us as neighbors. And if they can't – well then just don't come back sniveling; I hate snivelers. You can't say we didn't try to tell you so.

Winning this war is doable folks. But it's a team effort. We'll probably always end up being on the internet databases but that can be avenged with the littler things like scratching of cars, or going to a clothing store and slicing new clothes on racks with a razor blade, or whatever you decide to do to pass anger on to others. It's the housing restrictions and harassment we have to get off of us, along with restrictions on what places we can go to like parks, schools, libraries, pools, and beaches. Obviously some reasonable restrictions while one is on probation or parole is expected – that's always existed for all on supervision – but none of these things should be tolerated once we are off of it. And of course, NO double standards. Once supervision is done our debt to society that the law demanded is paid. (And by the way, in the case of some of you who were harassed or abused in prison by inmates who hate what we did, you over paid your debt. You should expect something back.) We have a right to pursue happiness in law-abiding ways. I have no problem causing unhappiness to others that make me unhappy. But doesn't it make sense that we're all left in a happy state? We can all live together you know. We did it for years before Megan, Jessica, and GPS got thrown into the mix. Granted, some of us are bad apples and will always want to offend sexually no matter what, but a good many of us can be good neighbors with no problems at all – but we need to be treated with respect first. With that I'd be one of the good ones – one of the best ones you could have. But being treated like so many people do or want to treat us, I'm your worse nightmare. And I hope I'm encouraging others to be likewise. Oops – I don't mean to use the word encouraging now. It's that disclaimer thing you know we covered earlier. Remember – disclaimer is in force throughout this entire letter now, and even my avenging book I sent you to.

Years ago in my creative writing class my teacher told us the duty of the writer is to prejudice the reader for or against. I hope I've given you the incentive to get back at these people. Trust me, it feels so good to get back at those who wrong you. This is no time to have a conscious guys. These are not innocent people you're costing money to. The majority of them voted, and/or encouraged people working for the judicial system, to make our lives less enjoyable in some ways. We're just returning the favor back to them. It's too bad we have to go to this extent but war is war. Obviously, parents don't want their children around us. Well then, let them keep their children away – not keep us away. I like the beach and I'm not giving it up! And I like ball games at the park and I'm not giving them up! We were living on this planet long before their kids were born. We should have precedence. It's all because of the kids that we are being kept away from things we like. We have an enemy and we know who they are. If we're stuck suffering let's make sure our enemies suffer also! I hope we all get active – but even just a few of us without a conscious can cause a lot of damage. I'll take what I can get. Those wishing to remain inactive, just remember, we're fighting for you too. As I mentioned earlier, the Declaration of Independence states that "all men are created equal." Others before us fought their double-standard problems. Now it's our turn. Let's get busy and take our rights back. All of our brothers and sisters, present and future, are depending on it. Once we accomplish that then all these abusive non-caring people can go back to having safe streets for their kids. We're on a journey here folks, a journey to get us the respect and rights we're owed. We've paid our debt and we've earned it! Dirty things happen to us only if we allow them to happen. If we all buckle down and punish in return wrongdoers will learn they can't commit these offenses and then ride off into the sunset scot-free. Certain things in life are givens. This has to be one of them! That is probably the most important lesson I can impart upon you. You may have heard the saying, "Revenge is a dish best served cold." Rather than immediately exacting revenge upon a person who has done wrong, as sadistic as it may be, it is much more satisfying to meticulously formulate a plan that can inflict harsh aggravation against the wrongdoer all without physically injuring anybody. Remember folks, the job's not finished yet. Let's end with that thought. Now let's do this thing!!! : -) MAKE IT SO.

You've surely heard of the Serenity Prayer. Here's my altered, kind of opposite, version – a motto I live by religiously. I call it the Avenger's Prayer.

Mythical Being
Grant me
the Anguish
to no longer accept the things
I cannot change,
the Craziness
to change the things
I cannot accept, and the Wherewithal
to punish wrongdoers resistant to that change.

Oh, and one more thing. I need to again emphasize the disclaimer. This letter, along with the web site containing my book I sent you to, do not encourage breaking laws. That issue is left up to each individual person to decide. Our goal is to encourage abusive and unfair authorities to change their ways. Most will agree it is better to look for a law-abiding course of action to resolve one's impulses and inclinations than it is to resort to law-breaking behavior. Realistically though, we realize some are not able to. Dabbling ones toes a bit into the forbidden waters of illegality is sometimes the only way to set right a wrong. The ball's in your court folks. At least try practicing non violence with no physical injuries. (That I do encourage.) Cost, inconvenience, and aggravate others – that I favor (but not encourage). I've always been a believer in hitting wrongdoers in their pocketbooks in some way because when they lose money they tend to fix their problems quicker. And for those bellyaching about my favorable speech as I express my opinions towards revenge, the 1st Amendment of our United States Constitution allows us to express opinions and beliefs as to what others should do to get satisfaction even if others find them distasteful. All bellyachers can do is snivel and pound sand. I am within my legal rights and confines in the rule of law. So there!!! I'm an easy dog to hunt with – my needs are simple. Just don't violate me in any ways, period! I'm Robert Hogan (pen name) and I approve this favorably speaking/Constitutionally permitted-message. Let the games begin!

Avenge on folks, and always remember, Operation Return;
SO Peoples' Lives Matter
